Prerequisites

Students should have enrolled in and passed Bachelor’s Degree in East Asian studies’ 3rd year’s East Asian Art and Popular Culture course.

Since most of the readings will be written in English, it is necessary to have a minimum level of reading comprehension in English in order to understand both compulsory and complementary readings.

Since it forms part of the specialisation in Culture, Art and Literature of East Asia, this course is complemented by East Asian Comparative Cultural Studies, but it is not compulsory to enrol in both of the courses if the student does not want to obtain that specialization.

Students who wish to do their bachelor’s degree final project about issues related to Advanced Issues in East Asian Art and Popular Culture should enrol in this course since, if it were not the case, they would have to independently compensate methodological and theoretical lacks.

Objectives and Contextualisation

• Acquire theoretical and methodological knowledge appropriate to the analysis of the works, products and phenomena related to popular culture and art.
• Apply those theoretical tools to the study of a particular issue under the teachers’ supervision.
• Participate in a collective analysis of the documents (films, literary works, etc.), reading or watching them in class as assigned by the teachers.
• Improve critical sense and individual analytical ability, as well as debate ability and intercultural and communicative abilities focused on the exchange of ideas and experiences.
• Use theoretical tools and the analysis of cultural studies to communication media and new social networks provided by ICT.
• Integrate interdisciplinary knowledge acquired during the bachelor’s degree in order to offer reasoning and studies historically placed and enriched by human multiplicity, and not to limit to a unique approach or an abstract and timeless analysis. Notice that specialization and preparation are not just contents or titles (easily available by different means), but mostly method: rigour, exigency and auto-critical ability. Make East Asian Studies graduated specialists basing on the fact being worked and argued as specialists, but not to make them to just accumulate knowledge previously presented as specialized.

Content

PART I. JAPAN.

Unit 1: Introduction to critical theory and cultural studies

In the first sessions, cultural studies and critical theory’s key concepts, schools and thinkers will be introduced in order to provide the students with the tools allowing them to critically begin to study works, actors and phenomena which will be used during the course. However, we will not go deeper in those contents, since they are offered in detail in East Asian Comparative Cultural Studies.

Schools:

• Formalism

• Narratology

• Structuralism
Unit 2: Social changes affecting labour model and family structures

We will analyse how recent cinematographic production reflects the crisis of family traditional models and androcentric labour models, and how that has been produced by the increase of social precariousness (Anne Allison) and by changes in masculinity model (Sharon Kinsella).

Unit 3: East Asian youth, the new social actors

Analytical tools and methodologies observed during introductory sessions can be applied to different society's elements. The analysis of materials will not be focused only in a certain aspect or dimension, but the teacher will also try to guide the reflection towards issues such as the followings:

- Youth as a driving force for change (or for stasis, if applicable)
- New familiar configurations and the crisis of the model of root family, not only regarding cultural tradition, but also regarding certain economic dynamics (for example, the role assigned to the youth housewife, in post-war society)
- Young women, their expectations and their reactions;
- Young cultures, not only as zoku for joining by aesthetical affinities-which, in any case, they are not random nor arbitrary-, but also as a result of social circumstances-for example, the yankii, which can be productively compared with collectives closer to Catalan urban space.

From the point of view of industries offering products or shows for popular consumption, from the second half of the 20th century an unequivocal trend appeared to massively take advantage of youth culture around the world (although there were already different precedents), especially with the globalization, which started from the 70s.

Apart from usual forces (consumerism, music, fashion, rebelliousness), East Asian youth react to a Confucian culture, but each generation makes way for the next generation, which repeats certain operations (Debord's thesis (1967) about the society of show and history).

In contemporary Japan, the interdependence of economy, consumerism and culture is obviously depicted in the art world, with amateur artists in websites such as Pixiv, Drawr and Tegaki. It is also depicted by the insolent attitude of Murakami Takashi and his acolytes in Superflat movement, arising due to the consideration of the art to be an economic activity, and by the exploitation of "Japan's Gross National Cool" (McGray 2001).

Different aspects related to (or affecting) youth are liable to be analysed during the class sessions. Likewise, other topics can be analysed, considering that critical theory is more an interdisciplinary methodological approach than a closed collection of contents.

PART II. CHINA.

In the last century, China was submitted to turbulent political changes. The world of artistic and cultural production played an active role in the transmission and promotion of new politics ideas. Slogans such as "art for art's sake" and "art for the people" characterized diatribes between Chinese intellectuals. In this part of the class we will analyze those artistic and cultural phenomena that contributed to this period of transformation.

We will start by analyzing the cultural production of the 1930s, with the Shanghai's cinema, the first documentary photographers, the modern xylographic movement and the production of satiric magazines.

The Maoist period will be important for the analysis of the consequences of Yan'an discourses for the People's Republic cultural production. We will also analyze the production of animation films during the 1950s. Finally, we will have a look at the Great Cultural Revolution and all its consequences for the Chinese cultural world.
In the last part of the class we will focus on the cultural production of the New Era, with a new wave of avant-garde artistic production that was symbolized by the '85 Movement. We will conclude with the 1990s and the beginning of the new millennium, during which we witness to constant dialogue between the actors of cultural production and the political power of the Chinese state.

Basic bibliography:

Films:

- Street Angel (malu tianshi) de Yuan Muzhi (1937)
- Springtime in a small town (xiaocheng zhi chun) de Fei Mu (1948)
- Frozen (Ji du han leng) de Wang Xiaoshuai (1997)
- Sunflower (Xiang ri kui) de Zhang Yang (2005)

Literature:

Methodology

Methodology

(To see assessment activities mentioned in the following methodological explanations, see "Assessment criteria").

Critical and cultural analyse methodology will be acquired by studying, reading and commenting different important figures' contributions in cultural studies, as well as by applying that methodology to text fragments-films, chapters from series or printed extracts-. The activity, consisting on comments done in common, will be carried out every week and will have an important influence in the course's final note.

In short, this course requires a high reading commitment in order to acquire relevant theoretical tools and the ability to add them in a productive way to intellectual and dialogical abilities. The type of critique and analysis to be developed by means of these classes is not like the media and informational critique model usually employed-both articles presentation and written work cannot be just argumentative summaries or comments from blogs having been recycled, but they have to be supported in academic structure and argumentation.
