Prerequisites

This subject has no prerequisites, although its completion is recommended once the 1st, 2nd and 3rd Bachelor's degree years have been passed, at the moment the students enroll in the last 60 credits or less to finish the Degree.

Objectives and Contextualisation

The main goal is that students show that they have the capacity to establish relationships between different subjects of the degree. It has an eminently professional character. This implies that it must be an original work in which students develop their ability to address current psychological problems with the appropriate disciplinary methodologies.

The TFG is carried out autonomously, based on a topic agreed with the teaching staff that will supervise its fulfilment.

Content

Generically, three types of TFG can be defined: (a) a systematic review, (b) an empirical research, (c) a professional or project intervention.

Theoretical work or systematic review: it is a work that provides an update on the state of the art around a psychological applied topic proposed by the teaching staff, following the guidelines of a systematic search.

Research: a work that arises from empirical research to answer some current and applied research questions in psychology proposed by the teaching staff.

Professional work or project of intervention: work that raises a project that contributes to the improvement or betterment to a given problem of any scope of application in psychology, based on the theoretical and empirical knowledge of the discipline.
